"I've found that in my career, the individuals who stay are the ones who can withstand frustration," says Michael Bendik, a firefighter with the Detroit Metro Fire Department. Bendik spends most of his time in Detroit's eastern suburbs. He's on the night shift. Listen to an audio version of this story (in MP3 or Real Audio) and read the story's text (below). Detroit's police officers and firefighters are on a kind of first-name basis with thousands of the people they serve. Firefighters are often part of a family's big Christmas celebrations. The five-bedroom brick house in Detroit's east side was once home to one of the city's fire officials, so on the coldest nights of the year, a team of firefighters will take turns warming up the family's living room. Like many Detroit-area communities, the Wayne County Health Department is facing a staffing shortage. It's the department that provides vital medical services to residents like those who live in this Detroit neighborhood of black and white homes. The health department has hired about 400 people since last year, but the new employees haven't yet fully taken over their positions. The hardest-hit posts are for social workers, psychologists and nurses, says Donald Gullledge, director of the health department. "We do have open beds right now, and we're trying to fill them," Gullledge says. "The demand is up. We're asking people to work in an area where they have people in need and they do not have any assistance." The staffing problem is typical of cities across the U.S. But in Detroit, the problem is exacerbated by the loss of industrial jobs and the slow recovery of the city's economy. And that's especially true of the police and fire departments. Wayne County fire chief Tedrick Robinson says that since Detroit's population fell by a third in the 1990s, the number of firefighters has been cut nearly in half, to just over 600. Robinson says the county also can't afford the training or the equipment that's necessary for these ranks of new
