Olympic soccer chief pushes back against doping crackdown LAUSANNE, Switzerland (AP) — The head of the International Olympic Committee has pushed back against new doping proposals unveiled by the World Anti-Doping Agency — instead calling for a better system to track suspected cheaters. At a doping summit Friday, International Olympic Committee President Thomas Bach told participants “no reasonable person” can be against a zero tolerance policy against doping. He added: “As long as athletes continue to dope, nothing will change,” and called for a single database to be set up, which would enable the transfer of data from any country to any other in the world. “We all know that it is easier to control something that exists rather than a potential future abuse of that same system,” Bach said. The proposals were announced during a three-day summit of the International Association of Athletics Federations and the World Anti-Doping Agency in Lausanne, where the clean sport movement is seeking to press for a total ban on testosterone-boosting drugs in sports. As well as a total ban on testosterone,
