Field of the Invention The present invention relates to the field of transducers. More specifically, the present invention relates to transducers used for detecting airborne sound. Still more specifically, the present invention relates to frequency modulated, microwave hybrid frequency transducers. 2. Description of the Related Art The technology of digital speech coding has changed little for the last thirty years. More than half of all digital systems in use today, such as cellular phones, modems, etc., are based on "CELP" technology, a form of speech coding first developed in 1970. Such technology typically implements algorithms and techniques for reducing the complexity of human speech by making use of the spectral efficiency inherent in spoken language. More specifically, in this coding technique, the voice is sampled at a relatively high rate of 16 kHz and the sample values are processed using mathematical transformation techniques (e.g., Linear Predictive Coding) to reduce the complexity of the voice to fit into eight, eight-bit units. The eight bit values (sometimes referred to as codebooks) are then encoded into a bit stream and transmitted. When a corresponding encoded bit stream is received, the eight bit values are recovered and a synthesizer is used to produce a voice waveform that resembles that of the original voice sample. The CELP speech coding technique, while theoretically extremely efficient, is based on one major assumption: that human speech exhibits very little correlation between successive samples of the voice waveform. However, there is growing evidence that humans do in fact tend to repeat the words in a sentence or utterance. This tendency to repeat the words is observed in longer sentences, or in certain words, phrases, etc. Such repetition is also prevalent in the most useful vocalizations made by animals, such as vocalizations used in communication between members of a species. However, in CELP speech coding the signal is assumed to be linear and periodic, so that each bit of data (i.e., each sample) is independent of any other sample, and thus of any other sample that has been and will be

The web of truth is like a spider's web. A new strand from someplace is caught by a fly, and after being drawn toward the fly it gets caught in the web, and so on, and so on. That's why, for example, the Indiana legislature made the tea party protests and the Moral Majority protests the same. That's why the Democrats have been supporting gay rights and abortion and Islam. That's why the Democrats cozied up to the John Birchers. So when you see a liberal giving the tea party a hard time on the issues of abortion and gay rights and Islam, ask yourself who the fly was 2d92ce491b
