health care, the expansion of biomedical research, and the decline of traditional medicine have been catalyzing greater interest in the traditional educational philosophy of the university. To train physicians, the public is learning more about the university in which medical education occurs. Are there components of the university physician educationally superior to the traditional medical school? First, unlike the traditional medical school, the university is not primarily for the preparation of the physician. Rather it is for the education of every citizen. Second, the nature of the courses and experience provided by the university will vary, and their relationship with each other and with the medical school will be more complex than in the traditional medical school. The structure of the medical school--especially the number of years required to complete the education of the medical student--requires careful consideration.

Although some medical schools do their best to comply with these special issues of the medical school, most do not.Q: Why use `make[1]` when `make -j` works just fine? The GNU manual on make (states: If there is only one job to be performed, one can use make[1] instead of make. This will not invoke make recursively. It will only try to find targets with the highest priority first, or, if there is no highest priority target, its dependencies, to find jobs to execute. If there are multiple jobs to be performed, make with default arguments is invoked as normal; make[1] is for the case when there is only one job to be performed. I understand the case when there are multiple jobs to be performed and make -j is called. But why use make[1] when make -j works just fine? A: It's easier if your makefile contains something like TARGETS = target1 target2 82138339de
