Caffeine abuse is the substitution of caffeine for a natural reward system. The mechanism of caffeine abuse is based on the reward system. A human reward system is the neurochemical reward system for pleasure and reward. Prefrontal lobe dysfunction increases the sensitivity to the pleasure. Glutamate is a main neurotransmitter in the reward system and the glutamate transporter GLT-1 in frontal lobe binds to glutamate. Since caffeine intake reduces frontal glutamatergic activity, caffeine abuse is induced by frontal lobe dysfunction. Furthermore, there is a relation between caffeine intake and schizophrenia. It is known that a history of caffeine intake increases the prevalence of schizophrenia in a group of patients with personality disorder. Therefore, caffeine abuse may be a risk factor for schizophrenia.WITT: The New Condé Nast Podcast
