The first edition of this book on "Elementary Algebra" was published in 1955-56. The publisher was Lagos University Press. It was a four-year course consisting of three years of Algebra with the other one year of Geometry. In this new edition, a more modern approach is adopted, in that the mathematics is treated from a modern mathematical point of view. A transmission electron microscope (TEM) is an essential tool used by today's physicists and material scientists to explore the structure of matter at the nano-scale or even the atomic scale. As a stand-alone instrument, it can be used for high resolution, non-destructive imaging of any matter. TEMs are also used for characterizing sample containers, for testing and optimizing instrumentation, for understanding limitations of the electron optics in an accelerator, and for providing image contrast information for electron diffraction and imaging. As a powerful research tool for examining materials properties, the research samples are placed into a sample holder and irradiated with electrons which interact with the sample through various physical mechanisms, causing the sample to emit X-rays which reveal information about the sample. TEMs are large instruments and require complicated and expensive instrumentation. As a result, they are typically used in centralized laboratories by a small number of physicists and other interested parties and are not easily moved from one place to another. Thus, the ability to easily setup and run a large number of TEMs quickly and reliably is not easily obtained. Further, the electronics of the TEM have to be closely controlled, making the electronics a critical item to protect and extend the time period of use. The ability to utilize a TEM and its associated instrumentation in a distributed setting is difficult. This is because the existing TEM instruments are not easily transported to remote locations and the large and complicated instrumentation of the TEM requires a substantial amount of room. Further, in order to transfer data to a research lab, it is essential that the instrumentation of the TEM, including the laser, the control box, and the computer be connected through a network. This process is complicated by the fact that the control box of the TEM typically communicates in a different language than the research lab and the computer is not a universal type. It is in this context that embodiments of the invention arise. Abstract This study examined how the functional role of the anterior cingulate cortex (ACC) changed according to subjective expectancy. We hypothesized that the ACC is more
