Digital images are often captured using two different types of camera sensors. One type of camera sensor comprises pixels that are relatively insensitive to light that is incident from a distance, and therefore useful for capturing still images. Another type of camera sensor comprises pixels that have relatively high sensitivity to light that is incident from a distance, and therefore useful for capturing video. For example, a conventional digital camera comprises a photosensitive imaging array comprising CCD image sensors, which is contained within a housing of the digital camera, and which is typically located on a printed circuit board within the digital camera. A lens of the digital camera is located to image light onto the photosensitive array. This is known as "front-side" imaging. The photosensitive array within the digital camera is typically located towards the front of the housing of the digital camera. When taking a picture, the digital camera is typically held by the user d0c515b9f4

Field of the Invention The invention relates to the art of loading tubular workpieces into the bore of a lathe, and more particularly to an improved means for centering tubular workpieces in a machining application. 2. Description of the Prior Art Lathes are conventionally provided with a central opening into which tubular workpieces can be received. The workpiece is centeringly placed within the bore in the lathe so as to rotate with respect to the headstock. Also known is the practice of preloading workpieces in the lathe bore, such as during the manufacturing process, so as to permit a rotational start-up of the lathe upon completion of the workpiece. Workpieces have been provided with a tapered bore insert and with a centering pin. Both of these elements can be expensive and represent a substantial time and expense item on the part of the manufacturer of the workpieces. Moreover, it has been found that such workpiece fittings do not always remain in a perfect centered disposition in the bore of the workpiece, and therefore, the centering pin must be removably located at a particular point on the tubular workpiece during the machining operation. This requirement mandates that the workpiece be preloaded in the center bore prior to each machining operation and also that the centering pin be removed from the workpiece subsequent to the machining operation to permit a removal of the workpiece. 1. Field of the Invention This invention relates to the fabrication of integrated circuit devices. More particularly, the invention is directed to integrated circuit interconnect structures for use in fabrication of very large scale integrated circuit devices. 2. Description of the Prior Art The fabrication of integrated circuits begins with a semiconductor substrate. A layer of conducting or semiconducting material is applied over the substrate. Using a variety of photoresist masking and etching techniques, integrated circuit components are created on the substrate. The integrated circuit components consist of a plurality of conductive paths separated from each other by interposed insulating layers. Contact holes are formed through the insulating layers to provide electrical contact between
